A VIRGINIA NEGRO.

An Old Slave of Confederate Minister Ma-son, of Mason-Sildell Pame, is now a Pa-millar Character in Chicago—His Life's

At one time he was well known to the suburban traffic that comes in and departs daily from the Northwestern station. There was a belore-the-war cast in his old face, a plantation hue and gait in his countenance and form. The whiskers were of the Galway cut, and he did business on one natural leg and a half leg, the remainder of the latter being wooden. He was a musician in his way, and a newsboy. He sawed and sold for a livelihood.

His fiddle was frosted under its bridge with real date.

with rosin dust, and he played always on one key. The air, if it might be called an air, was an imitation of Bonaparte's retreat from Moscow, which is the most dismal thing in musical crea-tion. He was more noticeable in the afternoon than the morping. He stood at the head of the outside stairway of the station with his fiddle and his bundle of papers. He played the doleful air and muttered one word as a monotonous accompaniment, "Pa as a monotonous accompantment, "Papahas."

They called him "Rube," his name, according to his own story, being Reuben Mason. Seven years ago he was sixty-four years old. He lived then with a Swede in a shauty that throw its shadow on the North branch of the Chicago river at the crossing of Chicago avenue. They used to make a pool of their earnings and get drunk with the same, and fight, and go to sleep on the floor of their shanty. One morning a policeman from the East Chicago avenue station found them in a corner asleep. The old negro had one of his hands in the yellow beard of the Swede, while the Swede's grasp clutched the throat of the darky. An empty beer can, battered, lay near by.

Suddely the all desirations agont in the same and the state of the same and the same according to the same according throat of the darky. An empty beer can, battered, lay near by.

Suddenly the old darky disappeared from the stand. The old Swede preserved a silence as to his whereabouts, and the police of the East Chicago avenue station thought for a while that a mystery was on, and there were intimations that the old Swede had thrown the old negro into the sluggish river.

Not many weeks ago Reuben ap-peared in the motley crowd that is seen daily in the Harrison street police station. He remained during the morn-ing session of the court, his old eyes ing session of the court, his old eyes looking brighter whenever a case was called. He carried his fiddle under his right arm. When the last case was called he went out with the tattered remnants and lost himself in the crowd. The next day he came to court, and the next, and the next, and so on until the days had huddled themselves into weeks.

The last time he appeared he was asked what it was that brought him to the court so often, as he never appeared with a complaint against him. He re-reluctantly admitted that he was look-ing for his boy. He had not seen him since the war, but he had heard through since the war, but he had heard through some source that the boy had gone to the bad; that he was a thief and vargrant, and that he had worked his way to Chicago.

"Jes watchin' for Sam. I knowed he was no good, an' I reckon de patrol cotch him putty soon. I down spect fo' to do nuffin to him. He ain't wull savin', no how. I jes want to got my eyes on him, an' of I git a chance I jes want to whack him one on de head wif dis hyer ole fiddle. Den I'se done wif him."

Reuben Mason was a slave before the war, and he claims that he was the pro perty of the Confederate minister who captured with Slidell, which even created an international stir. He also claims that his old master gave him his freedom and a hundred bales of cotton. His story further relates that he was a cook for a rebel cavalry company dur-ing the war and that he witnessed the engagement between the Merrimac and

MAN TURNING TO STONE.

George W. Keller, of Philadelphia, Con-fined to His Hed Eighteen Years and Gradually Recoming Ossified - A Remarkable Case. Philadelphia Press

There is a man strotched on a small pallet at 1525 Stiles street who is gradually becoming ossified. His name is George W. Keller, forty years old. The last eighteen years of Keller's life have been devoted principally to "auffering intense pain and reaching that perfect state of rigidity which his entire body, except his head and left arm, has assumed. Keller's case has bailed the skill of medical experts since the year 1877. No dector has yet succeeded in relieving his condition or even side-tracking the terrible progress of his affection. He lies on his little bed apparently with consumate resignation, but occasionally wondering what he will eventually turn into.

Although Keller is in the eighteenth year of his suffering, his face has not perceptibly changed, while his body is distorted and curled after the manner of a superannuated corkserow. Keller's ailment is known in medical parlance as "heumatoid arthritis," but to the unsophisticated observer it would appear to be a case of gonuino ossification. The first symptoms of it were manifested in 1872 but reasonated readily to treat. George W. Keller, forty years old. The to be a case of genuine essilication. The first symptoms of it were manifested in 1872, but responded readily to treat-ment. When in his twenty-second year in the summor of 1877, Keller paid a visit to Atlantic City, where he sewed the seeds of his subsequent suffering and deformity.

It was a warm day in July of that year, and he enjoyed himself in a merry dance in the excursion house. Be-coming overheated he thoughtlessly went in the water to cool off and contracted a severe cold, which speedily developed into the silment from which he is now suffering. He was then a prolicient shee finisher, but the disease grasped him with such an iron grip that he never worked again.

In 1879 and 1880 Keller was treated at the Jefferson hospital, but the late Pro-fessor Gross pronouficed him incurable. In 1882 he was taken to the Presbyterian hospital, but after a beet address in hospital, but after a short sojourn in ler's case was not in the category of curables. In 1887 Keller was treated at the University hospital, where all ef-forts to alloviate his sufferings proved Keller still retains a slight motion in the neck and left shoulder, but his hands have become frightfully crippled and distorted. The muscles have contracted and stiffened, and his claw-like lingers have turned inwardly with such persistence. and stiffened, and his claw-like inger-have turned inwardly with such persist oney that it was necessary to pry them open and place cotton on the palms of the hand to prevent them being pierced through. It is only by an almost superhuman effort that Keller can move his lower limbs, and then the movement comes directly from the shoulder, and can scarcely be noticed.

EYESIGHT LOST.

Almost during the entire period of Keller's illness he has suffered the most excruciating pain, which he has borne excremating pain, which he has borne with the utmost fortitude. He had a severe attack of neuralgia about four years ago, which took the vision of the left eye along with it and left unpleasant recollections behind.

Keller occupies his time chiefly in smoking a huge briar-root pipe, which he manages to light with a match stick dettrought manipulated with hes circ.

The stem of the pipe always lays within easy reach of his mouth so that with a slight movement of the head Keller can catch it between his teeth. He likes to eat anything and overything that's good and some things the are detimental. and some things that are detrimental to nis peace of mind, for Keiler also occasionally suffers from indicestion and dyspepsia. Dr. Howard E. Martin, of Eighteenth and Green streets, who has attended Keller since his departure from the University hospital, treats him when these attacks of indisposition

Notwithstanding the extreme suffer expression of his countenance is as buoyant and peaceful as when he was hale and hearty. His demeaner is always cheerful, his face animated by a bright smile, and his conversation is continues and his conversation is enlivened by a picturesque humor. Keller is passionately fond of music and coincides with the statement of the late William Shakespeare, that "A woul without music is neither fit for a man or dog."

Keller keenly feels the absence of the gentle touch of his mother's ministering hand for she is confined to bed with an incurable cancerous complaint. He has a young brother, however, who is most assidnous in his attention to mother and son before he leaves and when he returns from work.
